Another Chance

In contemplation one day Jeanie found herself alone in a vast wilderness of sand and sky. Far off in the distance was a figure approaching on a horse. As he came into clear view, she recognized him – the ECK Master Shamus-i-Tabriz, an old and dear friend. Yet he rode on by.

Gripped with the feeling of a passing opportunity, she called his name, “Shamus!”

In that instant he was just approaching her again—like a replayed movie scene. But this time he stopped where she stood. Jeanie remembered him from a past life when she'd been a student of ECK and the Mahanta.

That was a long time ago. Yet the love bond between them remained un-broken.

“There was something I could not learn from you before,” she said. “There was something you were trying to teach me, I could not learn.”

Shamus looked at her with his ever-seeing eyes. “You must love God more than your love for God,” he replied. He then rode off, leaving her with this enigma.

It took her some time to determine the full import of his cryptic message, even though her heart understood part of it when the words had first left his lips. There was more to love than she knew, than she could see, and more especially to loving God than anything she could imagine.

Through her spiritual senses Jeanie later realized that even beyond what she could know or see today, every part of herself must wholly be given to God in love.
